

Last week the EPA took a major step in updating its guidelines for chemicals that might cause cancer. The old guidelines were more than 20 years old and did not incorporate modern medical research. Now for the first time, the guidelines acknowledge the likelihood that children may be more vulnerable to exposure than adults. This is an important step forward for environmental protection and public safety and I applaud the move.